The new feature is a direct response to the wide criticism surrounding FIFA's older core gameplay, and the core gameplay not improving much over the last 10 years of FIFA. The core mechanic hasn't changed much since FIFA 16. Players are forced to dribble until they lose possession, and the best players in the world are now incredible dribblers. It's like playing football with a sledgehammer. With HyperMotion Technology, the game takes players' natural interactions and translates them directly into the game engine. Physically impossible actions, such as a player going through a player's legs to score a goal, can be made possible. Players now have the same strength of their real-life peers, and the best skills are now no longer the equivalent of wrestling in a mud pit. Skill and balance have been restored, and the best player in the world now performs like the best player in the world in reality. "We are constantly watching what real players do," EA Sports lead gameplay developer Daniel Mitchell said during a presentation on June 6, 2019. "When we came to develop FIFA 10 years ago and think about the way the world was playing, for example, a 30-degree bank shot off the boot was considered a difficult shot. Twenty years later, footballers can flip a ball on the same amount of times with the same momentum on that same bank shot as they could in the past. "What FIFA 17 showed was that if you take the same things that are happening in the real world and translate them to the game, there's a much better balance between top and bottom players. Now, top players aren't completely overwhelming. The same applies for the gameplay in general. The mechanic hasn't changed for a while, but the balance of the game has changed, and that was a result of our attempts to keep the game true to the real-world." This new engine was the foundation of the "mapping update" (the most recent update to FIFA that received the most attention) released in August 2018. It's a lot of work, and the effects of the entire engine get rolled into everything from player-to-player collision to the smoothness of a player's dribbling. "We are constantly watching what real players do," EA Sports lead gameplay developer Daniel Mitchell said. "When we came
