Intraocular lenses are lens implants to be implanted into the human eye. These lenses, which replace the natural crystalline lens, have been devised for use in cataract surgery where the natural lens is surgically removed and the intraocular lens is implanted. Typical lenses have a circular planar optical zone, with the center thereof coinciding with the center of the pupil of the eye. The lens may have a central optical zone with one or more than one diametrically opposed peripheral optical zones. Such lenses, however, are of simple shape and are not suitable for various purposes in post-cataract eyes where lenses are used to correct high, near, and intermediate visual acuity defects, such as myopia, hyperopia, astigmatism, presbyopia, and other higher order refractive errors of the eye. Some of these lenses are of asymmetric shape, having a first curvature in the central optical zone and a second curvature in the peripheral optical zones for correcting high visual acuity defects. Others have asymmetric shapes for correcting astigmatism. Still others have both central and peripheral optical zones of asymmetric shape
