Cheb Khaled-Sahra NEW! Full Album Zip

we are the world: a benefit for the poorest people in the world [emi, 1985] although it started with a $2 million music industry cash grab, and without any compunction whatsoever, here's the poster child for a philanthropic label--rufus thomas' smash recording of this feel-good charity song. emi also owns the production company which, until just a few months ago, was home to people like jimmy iovine, bob marley, and jay-z, who never sold out, while the philanthropists who did felt like they did. even the line-up on this album is generous--it contains a song by nina simone, which shows that the act of being present and singing here requires no talent. a gather 'round [nonesuch, 2011] listening for any trace of the music from the masterful but now-defunct lost highway comp, i don't hear any, but i don't hear anything i've heard. it's not that the music's too classical, or not as good as on the lost highway album; it's that it's too marvelous, and i don't need to hear it. i'm not convinced that i need any of the new material from john paul jones either, but there's no way i'm not going to find out about this. b- the private collection of cheb khaled-sahra: remixes [mca, 1999] the big man's first album of original material since his alive is a mixed bag. in the post-peer gynt world, his frisky rock 'n' roll is tossed aside for an elusive jazz-like amalgam that can be perfect, perfunctory, or somewhere in-between--depending on who's doing it. lending his unlikely instrumentation to a bevy of elite jazz cats, the blue note-alumni pianist (who won't be on the rest of the label's discs) was bemoaning the fact that nobody plays his compositions anymore. if the album's first half is tastelessly glorified cover art, its second half is a pleasant surprise. the two pieces with saxophonist joshua redman are especially exciting, as both are caught between mr. sahra's whimsicality and the soprano's gorgeous lyricism. the album's most intriguing track, "the beat," with joshua's collaboration, the cinema cafe band featuring pianist jason moran, is a musical conversation between sahra and the composer/arranger that is so seamless, i'd love to know what sahra was trying to say. both sahra's remake of "go back home" and the original are a little schmaltzy, but the jazzier the music, the better it is, and these are among the best tracks here. a jewel. a-

When you think of the '90s rap explosion, it's hard to avoid images of Mos Def manning the mike, or Clipse and Jay-Z and Kanye O'Riordan in the booth, not to mention the minor league and indie heroes who achieved a certain kind of cult following amongst college kids and punks. West Coast sensibilities still prevail in hip-hop, however, and while rap wasn't as mainstream in the '90s as in the '80s, and while East Coast rap was generally tougher, it didn't have the mass market appeal. Some of the top rappers were from California. Cheb Khaled was a bit of an exception. He was a Lebanese Rockabilly guitarist who had already had some success playing in the souk with his group, the Youssoufa. He was a one-man band, but his East Coast counterpart, David Banner, had a following as well. Both men played the clubs and the university circuit, and when they decided to test the waters on Broadway Records, they chose a song with a hook that was going to be catchy, a lesson learned during their experience doing the souk in Beirut with a Beiruti producer. That producer had a more personal history with the song, though, and so did the manager, bankrolled by Big Boi and The Neptunes. This guy's name was Fat Joe, and while neither he nor his label mates West Coast rappers had any real access to major labels, they owned minor labels; they knew how to make a song, and they had a good ear, a talent for finding the true soul in a song's source. As for the rest of the album, it's a collection of other records that were fun to listen to. Fat Joe recorded this album for his own

Konch label, and Fonky Family and others who worked with Banner and Khaled did a solid job of putting together a nice set of LPs. B+ 5ec8ef588b
